I see a lot of tutorials out there that encourage you to get the full scope by declaring variables at the top of your function. But the less cleaner alternative is to just get the inside scope: function someFunction() { var a = "hi"; var b = "hello"; } But what's the difference? It would appear that its just a style thing. A: If you look at the spec you'll see that the scope chain is initialized when a function is created and is reset when the function is invoked. So inside that function, all you have is the values that are declared. After the function has finished executing, if a = "foo", b = "bar" and a or b are used, you'd expect them to refer to the values that were declared inside the function, not the global values. With a closure you have access to both the variables inside and outside the closure, and from that perspective it seems like an easier way to reason about your program. A: But what's the difference? It would appear that its just a style thing. The difference is that you can access the variables using the variable name inside of the function, whereas the full scope is more useful when dealing with inheritance.

HERE: Spring Integration expression language pattern matching I have a problem with Spring Integration SAML service provider, I am trying to match the incoming traffic on the SAML endpoint with the expression language described in the documentation. I am using a message-driven-channel-adapter, and by logging the content on the logs, I can see the correct SAML payload in the log, however the expression language doesn't seem to be working. I am expecting the flow to only flow to the endpoint when this match the expression. I am basically trying to have a SAML authenticated container, where a user will be able to validate the SAML certificates on their device, to do this, I am creating an SSO server as mentioned here : I am using an hk2 expressionLanguageInterceptor to apply the expression language described in the documentation
